"WITH A SILVER LINING."

CHAPTER II.

All night in the summer stillness came the song of a nightingale from among the roses. All night with feverish restlessness a man tossed on his couch of pain. All night in the silver moon-rays a girl lay awake and uneasy, with throbbing veins, still strained and aching eyes that would not close, and a strange dull foreboding in her heart that had never chilled its gladdening beats before.

"Was life really so sad?" she wondered. "Did it hold pain so great and woe so deep that the heart turned to bitterness, and joy to grief, and love to hate? Would the cloud shadow her own life, too, since the old man had told her none could escape?"

Through all her dreams this one thought ran, haunting her, saddening her, chilling her natural joyousness, disturbing her natural gayety, which had been, hitherto the gayety of a child knowing naught of evil, dreading naught of pain.

With the morning light her father sought the stranger's side, and dressed his wound with some of the old medical skill that he had never forgotten, though he had long ceased to practice as a physician. It was then that, for the first time, the young man learned the story of his danger and rescue, and heard with mingled wonder and admiration of the heroism to which he owed his life.

"What can I say," he murmured as the story ended, and the old man's voice trembled with emotion over the recital of his darling's bravery and deadly peril. "No words, no acts can ever repay such a debt. I wonder you do not hate me, seeing in my foolhardiness such risk to the life you love so well?"

"She is my only child—my all," said the old man tenderly. "To have lost her—well, there lies no word to paint the agony of that thought. And yet, I would not have had her act otherwise. In Heaven's sight are not all lives equal?"

"There would have been none to mourn me," said his companion sadly. "My existence is of small value in comparison with what hers seems to you."

"Ay, Heaven be praised, she was spared!" was the fervent ejaculation. "But you are over young to talk of being so little missed or cared for."

"Nevertheless, it is quite true. I am utterly friendless. My life has been hard, loveless, toilsome; it is of small account to any one but myself."

"I hope you do not follow the cant of the day," rejoined the old man somewhat sternly, "and allow there is no good or desirable thing in life now, and therefore waste its fairest and freshest years in the exhaustion of folly—the lawlessness of sin!"

"No; I do not hold such views. But to exhaust the follies of life and to follow its lawlessness one must be rich enough to reckon no cost, or vicious enough to stay for no better impulse. I am certainly not the one, for I am a poor man, and live by my wits. I hope I am not the other, since, amid a life that has always been hard, and a path that has always been lonely, I have still kept faith in heaven, and pity for man, and reverence for woman."

"Have you a mother?"

A dark shade clouded the frank young face.

"She is dead," he said. "As for other relatives, my father has disowned me. I do not even know his name. No brother or sister I never possessed. I am quite alone. I believe I am entitled to be called a gentleman. I gain my bread by poisoning, or doing illustrations for periodicals. I live most of the year in London, and have come to this village for a month's rest, as my health has not been strong of late. There is my history, Sir. It is all my introduction."

"And quite enough," said the old man heartily. "Your face is too frank and open to deceive, and I am quite sure your heart is honest too!"

He shook hands cordially with the guest so strangely brought beneath his roof, and then bade him come to the little sitting-room when he felt sufficiently rested.

"You will find Vera there," he said in his genial, kindly tones, that were so frank in their cordiality, so trustful in their welcome. "My daughter. I mean!"

"May I ask the favor of your name?" said the young man stiffly. "Miss is Keith in Brandon. I do not know whom I have the honor of addressing."

"My name is Ashford; it used to bear the appendix of Doctor, but I have dropped it long since."

"I am not to use it then?" questioned Keith.

"If you wish, certainly. But most of the people here know me only as 'Mister' or 'Malster,' as they pronounce it. Now, I really must be off. You are sure you are strong enough to come down stairs?"

"Quite sure. Why, gratitude alone would give me strength, were I not all curiosity to see one who with a woman's weakness unites a man's heroism."

"You must not spoil Vera's simplicity by fine words and London manners," said the old man with sudden gravity, as he stood at the door and looked back at the handsome face and strong erect young figure in the room beyond.

"Do not be shunned," was the gentle response. "I reverence the simplicity and guilelessness of a true woman beyond all earthly things."

"You were no true man if you did not," said Doctor Ashford gravely, and he closed the door and went down stairs to Vera with his usual calm face and tender smile.

"How is he?" the girl asked eagerly as she came up and kissed him.

"Much better. He is coming down stairs presently. He is anxious to see you, and thank you for your bravery. Oh, my dear —my dear, I tremble even now at the thought of it. If help had not come!"

"Why trouble yourself over possibilities, father," said Vera gently. "Help did come, and there is no need to tremble. Your pet is safe here, and likely to plague you a good while longer."

The old man smiled lovingly at the bright, beautiful face.

"May heaven send all fathers such plagues!" he said tenderly. "What happy homes there would be, my darling!"

"You will make me vain with so much praise," she said merrily. "Come along and have breakfast. I had better send some up for the invalid, I suppose?"

"Indeed, no, Miss Ashford; the invalid is here to answer for himself!"

At the sound of the voice she turned; the sunlight wavering over her delicate face, the look of startled wonder and of glad surprise that lighted her soft sky eyes. They looked like each other.

As their eyes met—as their hands touched—as their lips opened in the old, trite, world-worn greeting which we use to strangers as to friends, so sugely something deeper awoke in each heart—something sweeter spoke in each glance! Then their hands loosened their clasp; but the feelings, startled into sudden life, never loosened their fast, sure links, riveted in that one brief moment, that one lingering look.

"So you have found a sweetheart?"

Vera was standing by the corner of a little brown, shallow brook, fringed with tall bullrushes and waving willow-stems. She started as the words fell on her ear, and looked round at the speaker. The old man whom she had met in the poppy-fields some three weeks before, the owner of the glebe," as the villagers all called him, was standing a short distance off, leaning on his stick, and scanning her with malicious eyes and sneering smile.

The girl's face flushed slightly beneath his scrutiny.

"What do you mean?" she asked him.

"You are still happy, are you not?"

She lifted her eyes to his with a dreamy wistful regard.

"I am very happy."

"And who is the handsome stranger who is always by your side now? I heard of your folly in nearly sacrificing your life for his. Of course, woman-like, you will complete it by giving that life to him hereafter, to guard or waste, as he pleases it."

She dashed on him a look of such startled pain, such speechless anger, as made the mockery of his own eyes fade.

"You have nothing to do with my actions," she said haughtily. "I scarcely think you mean to insult me, but your words are, to say the least of them, unwarrantable and incomprehensible."

He laughed.

"I thought nothing in the way of admiration was incomprehensible to women. I scarcely suppose your new friend has been with you so constantly and left you unaware of your own attractions. You must know that you are beautiful."

The proud eyes swept over his face in calm surprise.

"You are the first person who ever told me so."

"Is your lover so cold then—or so blind?"

"How dare you use such words to me?" she said, with sudden anger in her voice, and a certain shame in her pained young heart. "You have no right—"

"Save my experience and your ignorance."

She shrank away with a movement of aversion.

"You need not remind me of that. If experience turns all fair and holy things to bitterness and contempt, I pray I may never exchange my ignorance for it!"

The keen eyes of the old man sparkled with malignant mirth. He liked to rouse the gentleness and calm of this girl's spirit to something more akin to wrath and bitterness than she herself was aware of.

"Keep this ignorance then, my dear," he said ironically, as she moved away with a slight bow of farewell. "Keep it with its sweet, trusting faith, its pure and child-like swift sister—content. When you part with them your life's happiness goes too!"

She made no answer, but turned away, hurt and pained, and left him by the brook side in the evening shadows.

But as she went homeward she could not forget his words. They had left her with heart from her rest; they had left her with memories whose innocent shame tortured her as nothing in all her bright glad life had ever done before. Hitherto her heart had challenged to the gladness of youth, the mere sense of living and enjoying the simple, innocent life she had known. Now a new element had arisen in that life, and through the golden haze of pure faith and trustful hopes and fair dreams another face looked back to her, another future cast and passed beside her own.

The old man's words had shown her this and left her disturbed and saddened all at once. This stranger whose life she had saved, whose presence had haunted her for these few short weeks, had grown unaccountably dear, though as yet words of love or gesture of passion had dyed in his speech or look. . .

She did not know—how could she—the conflict that he waged each day, each hour that found him in her presence. She could not guess how hard it was to restrain every look and every word that might betray his own secret. She did not know that, being in his own sight a nameless jobseeker, cutting son of fortune, he, therefore, deemed it dishonorable to awaken either interest or regard for himself in the girl's fancies, knowing that to take, or seek to take her from the safety and innocence of her sheltered life, and ask her to battle with him through the stern and sordid ordeal which his own fate represented, was a thing utterly impossible to his generous impulse and his chivalrous love. Therefore he guarded himself so closely, and betrayed by no word or sign the weakness that at times she unconsciously tempted almost beyond endurance. Therefore it was that he said to himself as he wrestled with a love that every day but strengthened and increased: "I will leave her unwooed. So best."

Perhaps some vague hope of a future when he might win her arose at times in his heart. Some vision of a home he might touch, a fortune he might secure. Then, he told himself, he might speak. Now it looked to him unmanly to do so.

"She will never know," he thought. "She is but a child still!"

But do or that he might be, could not forget her—he could not learn for her less. With one look she had shattered the serenity of his whole previous life, and left to him a memory that was precious and painful both in one, and had given him along with its preciousness a weary self-contest that brought but little hope of peace, but little cure for victory. For he loved her too well to forget, and however these lay a barrier that it would be the work of years to overthrow, the foe of many a youthful love—poverty.

He had grown accustomed to shifts and straits for himself; to go without meals; to deny himself all but bare necessaries; to live from hand to mouth, toiling, sweating, struggling, fighting single handed in a great city's warfare; but to ask her to share such a life or risk such straits, with only his arm to lean on, his love to recompense, was what he had no courage to do.

He was her debtor. Could he ask her to take such recompense as this? Could he repay in the cold heroism that had risked his life in his service without a thought of consequence?

All the manhood in him rebelled age ast the thought. He crushed down he impotent desires that stung him to madness—the passionate longings which strove ever and always to tear aside the mask of impassiveness where-behind regrets that no power on earth could fulfil to rest.

"I must leave her," he told himself. "I cannot, dare not, stay here, longer. With each day my strength grows less."

Even as the words were on his lips he met her face to face.

She was coming home with the old man's taunts still fresh in her memory—with the insolence his words had awakened still burning in her innocent heart.

As she saw him the color flushed from brow to throat. Her eyes dropped. The usual welcome died on her lips unspoken.

"I am glad I have met you." he said, with his usual courteous gentleness. "I was about to call at the cottage to say farewell. I leave to-morrow."

She started slightly. Had he but looked at her he would have seen the sudden pallor of the sweet face, the flash of pain in the wistful eyes. But he was looking far beyond, to where the sun's ray touched the river's outer breast with slanting bars of gold.

"It is sudden—is it not?" she said at length.

Her voice sounded cold because of its hard-won firmness, her cheek flushed back to warmth with sudden pride.

"Yes," he answered, looking at her face now, but unable to meet the eyes she steadfastly averted. "It is sudden. I am grieved to go. I have been so happy here. I shall never forget this place, or you!"

A few moments later she stood there alone, her eyes on a retreating figure, her hands clasped tight on her fast-throbbing heart.

With all her pain a thrill of gladness mingled softly. "He said he would return."

And with the music of those words in her memory, she passed across the yellow corn-fields and took the pathway home.

"I am sorry young Brandon has gone," said the old Doctor that evening, as, leaning on Vera's arm, he paced up and down the little garden. "I shall miss him very much."

Vera was silent.

"I wish I could have learned more of his history," resumed her father. "He goes by his mother's name. She never would tell him his father's. She had been cruelly wronged, and driven from his roof with her infant son, and only the charity of strangers stood between her and starvation. From what Keith says she must have been a noble woman."

"And she is dead now?"

"Yes, my child—dead—with her honor tarnished by a cruel lie, and her son's life darkened by an unmerited shame. It is very sad—very sad."

"How clever he is! He has such great gifts!" sighed the girl with unconscious pathos.

"Yes; he is both gifted and noble. But he is so poor, and in the world genius always suffers in the grasp of poverty—it is a mortal foe. The man who can flower genius with success lives in a palace—the man who owns it in a hovel. The one who buys is great, the one who creates may want bread, or be thankful for a beggar's crust. Yes, it is strange, but true."

"There is not much happiness then in the world?" questioned the girl, to whom all knowledge of its miseries and sins and woes were alike unknown.

"My dear, there is happiness everywhere for those who seek it aright; but it is a word of many meanings, and the meaning is only—there!"

He pointed up to the radiant heavens as they stretched in cloudless calm above his head. The girl's face grew awed and pale as she looked at him, then suddenly she drew his arms around her and laid her head upon his breast.

"You have made all my life's happiness for me," she said. "How good you are—how good!"

"My love, none are that!" he said tenderly. "Being mortals, and being weak though sin within and beset by sin without, how could it be otherwise?"

"Do you know anything of the old man at the glebe?" asked Vera presently. "He speaks to me sometimes, but he is very hard and very bitter."

"I only know him by what the people here say," answered her father. "That he is miserly and eccentric, and lives quite alone, save for the old witch-like woman who attends to his simple wants. I have never exchanged words with him since I lived here."

"I feel so sorry for him," continued the girl pityingly. "And he talks so straggely to me always. He seems to resent the mere fact of my being glad and light-hearted as an injury to himself. He warned me one day that every life had its shadow—its days of woe and darkness and grief—that mine would come too. If they do—Papa, papa! what is it?"

The awful agonized cry that left her lips was echoed by a groan of mortal agony. The old man's feeble form seemed to slip from her child's arms, and he lay on the grass at her feet, stricken a fallen log, in the grasp of that terrible foe—paralysis.

The girl's shrieks quickly brought the old woman-servant from the house, but their united strength was unequal to the task of carrying that helpless burden. All had to be presigned from the village, and medical assistance summoned; but the old doctor's great age rendered science of no avail. He lived for a week unconscious, then died in his child's arms.

Over her life the cloud and darkness of a great sorrow had indeed fallen.

To be concluded.
